[illegible] Massachusetts, Minnesota, [illegible] and Dakota also have front seats. The Ohio delegation is directly back of the New York seats, while Michigan, Iowa and Illinois are on the main aisle near the center of the space reserved for the District of Columbia delegation, designated by a white banner marked in black letters. This is a conspicuous departure from the general plan of notice the delegations, the signs of all the others being designated by a blue silk banner lettered in gold. A significant view is the open space of empty seats in the Virginia delegation. The four Mahone delegates at large have been admitted to the hall and are alone in their glory, with plenty of room, over in the extreme southwest. There are no indications in the hall of the

GREAT CONTENTION

while the delegates and those who held seats were being called and directed to their seats. The doors were not opened until all of the inferior arrangements were completed, and the crowd was kept waiting until two large bouquets of [illegible] and a floral shield were being nailed upon the chairman's desk, which bears in Greek letters this inscription: "James A. Garfield, nominated from this desk in 1880, and James G. Blaine, nominated from this desk in 1884." The air of the hall is delightfully cool, and although a large number of spectators, as they come in, leave fans in their hands, they find no practical use for them.

THE FIRST DELEGATES to reach their seats are those from Ohio, led by Congressmen McKinley and Ben Butterworth. McKinley, who is much talked of as a dark horse, is recognized by a few spectators in the gallery and gets a cheer or two, which however is short-lived. The Michigan delegation follows the Ohio men, coming in as a body, filling up their seats on the front of the second aisle. As the spectators are generally admitted more tardily than the delegations there are few demonstrations as the convention begins to gather. Most of those inside the [illegible] ones, who are deeply interested, but not demonstrative. Senator Hoar of Massachusetts, chairman of the last national convention, walks down the aisle to the front, followed by his fellow delegates, and takes his place as chairman of the delegation without being recognized by the galleries, and a delegate who looks enough like Depew to be his twin brother talks a few moments with the Massachusetts senator and retires. It is not Depew, however, but the resemblance creates some little comment, and there are not a few guesses as to his identity. At a quarter to 12 o'clock members of the

in pairs and groups. Thurston, of Nebraska, arrived with the members of the delegation from his state and takes his seat on the stage, just back of the chairman's desk, which he is soon to occupy as temporary presiding officer of the convention. Thurston is a smallish man, who wears glasses and is dressed in sombre black.

FREMONT WELCOMED.

As General Fremont entered the hall he was greeted with a round of applause and cheers, the first genuine demonstration of the morning. He was escorted to a seat on the platform, where he provoked a further outburst of applause by meeting Fred Douglas as he came to a seat beside him and shook him by the hand.

Carson Lake, of the national committee, came upon the platform just before the convention was called to order. He brought with him two handsome oak gavels, one of them merely polished, intended for hard pounding, the other a more pretentious affair, intended as a gift to the temporary chairman. It is richly chased in gold, and has engraved upon its several gold bands the names of Washington, Lafayette, Grant, Lincoln, Garfield and Logan. Precisely at 12:30 the gavel of Chairman Jones, of the national republican committee, sounded sharply upon the mahogany desk, and the republican convention of 1888 was FORMALLY OPENED.

The hum of conversation died [illegible] out the vast auditorium and the buzz of expectation gave place to impressive silence, and the chairman introduced Rev. Frank W. Gunsaulus, of Chicago, who opened the proceedings with prayer. He thanked the Almighty for the blessings of divine protection, returned the gratitude of the nation for the benefits granted it by Providence, returned thanks for the history which came passed here, and expressed recognition of all that good done through the great organization whose representatives were here assembled. He prayed that the convention might be dominated by lofty purposes in order that its work might do much for the glory of God and man. In an impressive manner he invoked divine protection on the soldier captives of our armies who lay so near death

[illegible]

At the conclusion of the prayer Chairman Jones announced that the secretary, Mr. Fessenden, of the national committee would read the call for the convention issued by the national committee. Allusions in the call to the position of the party upon the tariff question, to the determination of the party to have an election and honest count, and other [illegible] were warmly applauded by the convention.

CONVENTION BEGINS COMMOTION

[illegible] reading of the [illegible] Chairman Jones stepped to the front of the platform and spoke as follows:

[illegible] party may well be [illegible] representatives [illegible] Wisconsin [illegible] convention [illegible] the [illegible] republicans [illegible] Lincoln [illegible] the democratic party be understood. The [illegible] are universally opposed to [illegible] other transactions, one little [illegible] Iowa. Thanks to Cleveland [illegible] allies, the democratic party has thrown off the [illegible] which it was heretofore [illegible] in the northern states and boldly declared for British free trade, and against American protection. This avowal has caused much adulation in certain sections of this country, and in all England, which has from the beginning been hostile to the industrial progress of the United States; but it has fallen heavily upon the [illegible] those portion of the democratic party. However, we must not expect that there is an end of dishonest pretenses. Deceit, fallacies and sophistry will again be resorted to and practiced. Therefore, we should have a platform based on true republican principles, free from equivocation or ambiguity, and should nominate candidates who are the embodiment of these principles. The founders of this government saw that it was absolutely essential for self-preservation that the original thirteen states become united for the purpose of protection and defense against alien acts and influences, as well as for economical and effective government. One of the first acts of the federal government was to provide for revenue and the protection of the industrial interests of the country. All our early presidents, from Washington to Jackson, inclusive, advocated a tariff for revenue and for protection. All great and patriotic statesmen of those days coincided in this policy. No man of note, who was a lover of his country, down to Jackson's first term entertained or expressed doubts as to the constitutionality or policy of protecting the industries of the United States against foreign competition. The tariff question was not considered as one embracing solely or chiefly manufacturers' interests, but one which broadly embraced the social condition of the laboring classes, the mutual interest of all home producers in home markets, and of the country's real independence. The British, who now shout free trade, protected themselves against all competition until they were masters of the commercial world, and until they realized that the United States with its great natural advantages and by a moderate use of the same means was becoming a formidable rival. It was only when Great Britain perceived something of the future of her American rival that she attempted to regain that control over this country by artifice which she was unable to hold or regain by force of [illegible]

After relating the history of the alleged alliance of the south with English manufacturers under the administrations of Van Buren, Polk, Pierce and Buchanan, Chairman Jones continued: The republican party rescued the democratic party, passed the homestead law, destroyed slavery, elevated "mudsills," restored credit, redeemed the country and started it anew on the lines contemplated by its fathers. To-day we occupy a much higher plane than any other people on the face of the earth. The republican party believes it not necessary or right that we should be reduced to a common level with other nations, but that we should have all the benefits of our natural advantages and the full enjoyment of our glorious heritage. The logical consequences of the theories of the democratic party would have left this country with but a fringe of population on the waterways. Many of the leading bourbon democrats of to-day look upon the magnificent development and grand improvements of the nation, which are simply labor, genius and management crystalized, as an unnatural and unwholesome growth, and believe we ought to go back to the days of ignorance, sloth and small things as quickly as possible. Through the criminal folly of certain professed republicans, and by fraud and duplicity on the part of the democratic party, our honored and gallant standard bearers in 1884 were defeated. Fortunately for the country, we still have the benefit of the wise laws passed by the republican party, and still have a majority in the senate of the United State, which majority have prevented unwise legislation. We are again confronted with the same democratic party, the mother of all the evil from which this country has suffered, asking for power to control and direct her future course, and we find the same element which first led it astray by malignant influence and dominated it down to the grievous days of the rebellion again in full control of its affairs. If the majority of American voters favor the giving away of the home market, incomparably the best in the world, and the forcing of our people, now the most prosperous and happy on the face of the earth, into competition with and down to the level with the cheapest, poorest and most miserable of our foreign rivals, the democratic reactionary doctrines will prevail. If not, the republican party will resume its authority and successfully lead this great country with its beneficent institutions toward that sublime goal which all parties believe to be its heaven-ordained destiny. I have no doubt of the result.

Chairman Jones then introduced J. S. Thurston, of Nebraska, as temporary chairman of the convention. Delegate Osborne, of Kansas, objected to the assumption on the part of the national committee of the right to name the temporary chairman, and asked if Thurston had been elected by the convention. Chairman Jones replied in an emphatic affirmative, for which he was vigorously applauded, but Osborne was not to be subdued, and in the name of the Kansas delegation declared to be responsible for the action of the national committee in this matter, and regarded it as a great mistake. [Hisses.] He desired the roll of states called in order that the Kansas delegation might cast its vote for Hon. Wm. Warner. No attention was paid to his demand, however, and Thurston immediately began his address.

The machine is not for Gresham. Will the machine name the winner?

It was a very impudent thing for the people to bring forward the name of Gresham. The politicians had already decided that Harrison was the Indiana man to be voted on.

The friends of Alger, Allison and Sherman are buying tickets to the convention from southern members at $50 each. Gresham is not putting up anything and hence his friends will not be present in large numbers. These southern members are a choice lot. They are always in the market to sell anything. There ought to be a good deal of sympathy for the people who do not wish these southern republicans to rule.

Two men at the Chicago convention have a historical interest. One was the first nominee of the republican party for president and the other the second nominee of the party for vice president. Of all the candidates for these two offices presented since, Blaine and Hayes are the only ones living. Both Fremont and Hamlin were in the senate in 1850 and therefore have a political experience that no other men now living except Jefferson Davis, who entered the senate in 1847, one year before Hamlin. The presence of these two men must vividly recall the great legislative contests before the war, as well as the war itself. They were among the founders of the republican party, but they are older in political life and experience.

The Blaine managers have decided on a still hunt. Their plan is to bring out as many local candidates as possible to lessen the votes of other candidates. For this reason Depew has been brought out in New York, Filler in Pennsylvania, Henderson in Missouri, and Hawley in Connecticut. The presence of these candidates will reduce the vote of Sherman and Gresham and prevent any nomination so long as the votes of these states can be retained for their local candidates. Then Blaine will be suggested as the only solution of the deadlock. It is a wise plan because it presents the only way of bringing out Blaine as candidate that would be permitted. But even in this case, if it is apparent that there has been a well considered plan to prevent a nomination so as to bring Blaine forward, Blaine cannot afford to accept the nomination.

The convention of delegates from the trade organizations, municipalities, and people interested in the establishment of the deep water port on the coast of Texas was called by the Fort Worth board of trade to meet at Fort Worth, Texas, July 10th, for the purpose of memorializing representatives in congress and devising means for the accomplishment of this object. Heretofore congress has made limited appropriations for different harbors on the Texas coast. But the money has not been sufficient to make any of the harbors deep enough for sea going vessels of the deepest draught. It is the intention for this convention to select some one point on the coast of Texas, so that there may be united action to secure the appropriations for the deep water port. So long as it is left to the different communities along the coast of Texas these appropriations will be scattered and no practical benefit will result for some years. The convention is one in which this state is peculiarly interested and should have our support. The board of trade at its next meeting should make some arrangement to send a delegate.

It will be very awkward for Depew to answer in 1888 what he said about the republican party in 1872 when a candidate for lieutenant governor of New York on an opposition ticket. While on the stump for the democratic party he said at Nyack, October 24 1872:

Corruption of all kinds had crept in and frauds upon the ballot box of gigantic magnitude were practiced for Grant's re-election. The time had come to restore the right of habeas corpus, and give to all the states self government with equal civil and political rights to all. * * * The Grant managers were [illegible] because they had no principle to build on. * * * Greeley beside Grant was a giant compared with a pigmy, and the question was Greeley and constitutional government with honesty and purity, or Grant with absenteeism dishonesty, and party legislation with land grabbers and stock speculators at the helm.

He said the re-election of Grant would [illegible]

"The policy with which the south has been governed for three years past by military force by carpet bag government by the suspension of the habeas corpus by the power of bayonet law will be the policy by which it shall be governed for four years longer."

It means that all the men in office against whom high crimes and misdemeanors have been proved shall retain their places through a second term because their acts have received the sanction of a majority of the American people in the election of Grant.

Of James G. Blaine he spoke in these terms:

Up in Maine I heard Hannibal Hamlin and James G. Blaine and men of that character and of national reputation, telling the republican party that if Horace Greeley was elected they might be entitled to their civil war and the payment of the great burden of the rebellion debt. They insulted the intelligence of their audience, or else they best appreciated what its intelligence was.

[Special Correspondence.]

TORONTO, June 14. Salmon are well protected in Canada. If you are going to that paradise for this noble game fish without having an invitation from some one who controls salmon water somewhere in the Dominion, you might just as well go to Florida with the expectation of killing polar bears. It is a good thing that this is so, for if there had not been a change in the methods of salmon fishing there, the waters of the Dominion would by this time have been as free from that great game fish as the preserves are hundreds of streams throughout country where the salmon was once abundant. In fact, the Canadian streams themselves some years ago were rapidly approaching a condition of fish extermination owing to the reckless manner in which they had been fished. For time out of mind the Indians, who lived in the salmon regions had enjoyed the undisturbed privilege of spearing the fish during the spawning season, and every year they killed thousands of the finest specimens in the rivers, the larger number of which could feed thousands of men. This destructive mode of fishing was in time adopted by white fishermen and it was allowed to continue until the rivers were threatened with utter extinction of the salmon family. This condition of things finally attracted the attention of the Dominion government, which at once took charge of the streams. Laws were passed under which every salmon and salmon egg in any stream in Canada became the property of the government, and since then no person has been permitted, under heavy penalties, to cast a line to tempt one of these fish or draw a net to entangle one, which one he first procures a license from the government to do so. The gentleman sportsman must plank down his little fee just the same as the brawny dragger of the net who prizes the lordly salmon only according to its range in the market quotations.

"Well," the unsophisticated angler may say, "what's to hinder me then from crossing the border, buying my license, and wetting my flies along with the rest of 'em?"

Much, my friend, much. It was discovered by sporting associations and private parties with money, not long after the government license system was applied to salmon fishing, that the law opened a way for them to get control of the streams, and they lost no time in doing so. So effectually have they taken advantage of their opportunity, there is not today a rod of salmon water in the whole of Canada that an angler can lease direct from the government. Wealthy English sportsmen have leased the most of the rivers. They employ keepers, who constantly patrol the streams from one end to the other, keeping off trespassers who may seek to enjoy surreptitiously a day or a few hours' sport, which they are unable to secure in the regular way, although they may be never so willing to pay for the privilege, and more especially looking out for the pot fishing poachers who are always watching their chance to invade the streams with their spears and nets. Other waters are held under lease by persons who secure them for the purpose of speculating in the fishing privilege. These speculators know all the best waters, and are so situated that they seldom if ever fail to get control of any they may be after. They have simply to pay the government license and leasehold fees, but by selling privileges under their license it is no uncommon thing for them to receive for a few days' fishing at one stream more than their entire season's license fees for a score of streams amount to. Lovers of salmon fishing who have no leasehold on the streams hire men to hunt up, before the season opens, any spare privileges that are to be had, and for these, if they are to be had, the longing sportsmen are willing to pay almost any price. Besides protecting her salmon and making her streams the best on the continent for the sport of salmon fishing, Canada's system of governing them yields a net revenue to Canada of nearly $25,000 a year.

It may well be imagined that under this system of dealing with sportsmen it is only the wealthy who can conscientiously enjoy salmon fishing in Canada the wealthy and their invited guests. For instance, prime Salmon may be bought in the markets almost anywhere for fifty cents a pound but if he thinks that is too much and goes to the house of the fish to economize and catching it himself, it will be apt to cost anywhere from $5 to $25 a pound. I have a party of friends who hold a ten year lease on a river in Canada. They spend three or four weeks up there every season. I have been there three seasons at their invitation and enjoyed their hospitality. There are only a dozen in the club, and they have some little cottages scattered all along the stream. I made a calculation last summer as to how much it actually did cost my friends to catch their salmon as compared with the market price at the fisheries, taking as a basis their catch for that season. As my friends are not extravagant, there was not so much discrepancy in the two amounts as there would have been in the case of less economical parties. Their fish including what I killed cost them exactly $3.25 per pound. But I wish to remark right here that the sport I have had in Canada was worth to me every cent it cost my friends.

The salmon rivers of Canada are all streams of swift currents whirling rapids and high falls. The salmon seems to make its way up these streams with as much ease as he moves down. One of the sights in the vicinity of Quebec is the salmon leaping at the Falls of Lorette and during July many persons assemble there to see it. The falls are a succession of steep tumbles, and the water rushes over the rocks with great velocity. The salmon gather at the foot of the lower tumble and with marvelous leaps up the very face of the rushing waters make their way to the summit without apparent difficulty gliding up the swift chutes like a flash and mounting each successive tumble until the grand summit is reached. The native Canadian will tell you, with a straight and solemn face, that when there was no legal interference with spearing the Indians were in the habit of gathering at the foot of the falls in their birch canoes and casting their spears at the salmon as they leaped the rapids making their casts with such marvelous skill that the salmon speared at was invariably stopped in his vaulting career, and fell back impaled by the Indian's cruel barb. Just may be true but I know for a fact that they tell the stranger many queer things in Canada.

The salmon fishing is at its best now and will continue good until the middle of July. There is not much use of fishing after that. There is always a big run of salmon in August and September but they give very uncertain and unsatisfactory sport.

Wares Demolished by Oil

Capt. Sullivan of the New York pilot boat Caprice says that off Sandy Hook not long ago his vessel was boarded by combing seas which threw her on her beam ends. He broke out casks of oil and filled them with oakum rags and anything he could lay his hands on, put them in bags and three gallons poured on the deck and on board. Then he threw them over the side and kept the weather bow dragging so as to just clear the water when on an even keel. He also rigged out two drags over the weather bow each composed of fifteen fathoms of chain on five fathoms of hawser held by seventy five fathoms of hawser. After the oil was used no more water came on board although before using it the sea was breaking a clean breach over the vessel. The drags kept the bow towards her meet the oil slick, the crest would quiet down and the wave roll harmlessly past. He used the oil for thirty-six hours and says it saved his vessel.—Boston Herald.

Yesterday morning about eight o'clock the New Orleans excursionists who were on their way to Denver arrived in the city over the Denver, Texas & Gulf railroad. They expected to arrive in Denver at half past seven o'clock yesterday morning but several unavoidable delays were encountered which induced them to come to Colorado Springs for breakfast. On arriving in this city they proceeded to The Antlers where they breakfasted after which some of the party took a short stroll about the city. Mr. L. R. Ehrich president of the board of trade, met the party and invited them to visit the city in a body. The president of the New Orleans chamber of commerce, Mr. W. Dudley Coleman who was with the excursion, has informed Mr. Ehrich that their movements were regulated by the Denver chamber of commerce but in all probability when their visit to Denver was finished they would come to Colorado Springs and Manitou.

Saulsbury's Troubadours will appear in their new farce comedy, The Humming Bird, at the opera house next Friday evening. A Chicago exchange says: Saulsbury's Troubadours were welcomed at Hooley's last night by a fine audience composed for the most part of the staunch old time admirers of this jolly little crew of mirth makers. The new farce, "The Humming Bird," as presented by the Troubadours is filled to the brim with life and action and like everything this company ever did, has scored wherever an opening could be found. The plot is much too slight to be dwelled upon but it is made the vehicle for many humorous situations. John Webster and Carl Augustus Honeymoon, a young married man and Nellie McHenry as his wife's lady maid. Of course Mr. Honeymoon is caught kissing this pretty lady maid—no man with a spark of prankiness in him would think for a moment of allowing the ghost of a chance to go unimproved, and the old Nick is to pay forthwith. The whole thing is so airy and agreeable, and this last night was immensely pleased. The Humming Bird will be one of the hits of the season.

"You can fool some of the people all the time, you can fool all of the people some of the time, but you can not fool all the people all the time."

Merchants who publish silly advertisements ponder on this profitably.

Is it better to deal with Clothiers who chin a thing and show very little, or to patronize a house that professes only what it can perform?

We have a great stock of things that men and boys wear. Our Clothing is carefully selected and well made. Choose your apparel HERE; because we can fit you, please you and after you once learn the merits of our goods believe you will continue to use them.
